I routinely share these abandoned works with my children, and this allows me to connect with them and show them a really fun, interesting part of my childhood. It's my opinion that servers allowing for now defunct multiplayer online games, as long as they are operated as non profits, should be allowed to exist without interference from the copyright holders. In the event the copyright holders return to supporting the software for profit, then this exemption should be canceled as long as the copyright holder is operating said servers to support said software for profit. I would love to be able to play some of my old MMO classics with my children!
